

Approximation and complexity foundations of deep nets

Andrew Barron^a

^a*Department of Statistics and Data Science, Yale
University, USA*

Abstract

Foundational tools are explained that arose in the preceding conference talk. We review probabilistic tools for establishing approximation properties. These include sampling tools used in batch and greedy algorithms for demonstration of approximation and cover properties as well as empirical process tools (of Rademacher and Gaussian complexity) and we show their relationship to statistical risk.
