

Information theory foundations of learning nets

Andrew Barron^a

^a*Department of Statistics and Data Science, Yale University, USA*

Abstract

Information theory arises in learning network methodology and analysis in three ways that we discuss. First in the formulation of description-length methods (such as complexity penalized least squares) for estimation of the network and its associated resolvability bound on statistical risk. Second in the determination of optimal rates of function estimation for these classes of functions. Third in the demonstration of the relationship between Gaussian complexity and metric entropy.
